GUIDELINES FOR JUDGING WEB PAGES

1. Quality of content. Is the site's content the result of original news gathering? Is it up-to-date? Does it provide full news reports as well as daily news digests?
2. Ease of use. Does the paper follow a logical sequence, beginning with the front page, leading readers elsewhere? Is there a table of contents? Can readers move easily around the site without wasted time? How many clicks does it take to get to a destination? What is the load time? Is a text-only version available as well as one with full graphics?
3. Design. Is the online paper visually attractive? Is there photography or mainly text? Does the product include advertising?
4. Interactivity. Does the online product provide readers with an opportunity to contact the newspaper's staff? For example, can readers respond to daily polls, complain to columnists, submit letters to the editor and suggest story ideas? Can readers talk to each other?
5. Innovations. Is the online newspaper designed basically to mimic the paper newspaper, or does it offer subscribers a link to more information on a topic, expanded versions of stories, extra photos? Does the site include methods of communication that aren't traditionally used in newspapers, such as audio, video or chat boards? Does it provide information that a paper edition can't afford to print in full? Does it give readers access to the paper's archives?
